

Viasat Wins Intellectual Property Suit Against Acacia Communications

July 17, 2019

Viasat Awarded $49.3 Million for Acacia's Misuse of Viasat Technology

CARLSBAD, Calif., July 17, 2019 /PRNewswire/ -- Viasat Inc. (NASDAQ:VSAT), a global communications company, today announced a jury in the Superior Court for San Diego County found that Acacia Communications violated intellectual property law by misusing Viasat's proprietary technology. Viasat was awarded $49.3 million in damages stemming from Acacia's breach of contract and unauthorized use of Viasat's soft decision forward error correction (SDFEC) technology, which Acacia used in the development of its Sky, Denali and Meru products.

Viasat licensed its SDFEC technology to Acacia a decade ago in an agreement that required Acacia to pay royalties for its use of any of Viasat's encoding and decoding methods. Acacia paid royalties on the first generation of its products using Viasat's SDFEC technology, but stopped paying for subsequent generations. During the trial, Viasat presented evidence that Acacia copied its SDFEC technology to create derivative, backwards-compatible products.

"We appreciate that the jury, in their review of the evidence, took corrective actions to ensure that the technology we invested years to develop will continue to be protected," said Rick Baldrige, Viasat president and COO. "Our SDFEC technology is the gold standard in the industry as evidenced by Acacia's use of our code in new generations of their product, and protecting our intellectual property and innovation is vital to us. The decision confirms Acacia's improper infringement of our valuable intellectual property rights."

Viasat expects to seek additional royalty damages under the breach of contract, as well as attorney's fees, including cost of proof sanctions. Such requests will be decided by the Court in subsequent proceedings. Acacia has the option to appeal the decision.

Viasat was represented in the matter by Kenneth M. Fitzgerald and Joseph L. McGeady of Fitzgerald Knaier LLP in San Diego, Matthew S. Warren and Patrick M. Shields of Warren Lex LLP in San Francisco and by in-house counsel Colin Ward.
